ith a bucket filled with greens, toast crust, old banana, corn chips and rice, Jody Main's three hens perk up when they see her walking through her colorful garden to her chicken coop to feed them.

A special treat for them is corn scraps and cracked wheat. The hens run up to Main as she kneels down with a handful of the treat. "They love to eat out of my hand. It's really sweet," she said.

Main has been raising chickens in her bountiful backyard in the hills of Woodside for 10 years, and for another 10 years before that in College Terrace.

Raising chickens

your own backyard. She will cover everything you need to know to raise and maintain hens, from setting up a hen house, to what plants you can grow in the garden to feed your hens.

Although Palo Alto and nearby cities allow backyard chickens, they draw the line at roosters. But Main said you don't need a rooster to have yummy eggs. She said her eggs have "a deep orange, custardy center and a creamy white."

The benefits of the hens go far beyond being a food source. Main also uses the rich, decomposed straw from the floor of the coop for fertilizer in her garden beds.

The broken-down straw, which has been kicked around by the chickens, is the lifeblood of Main's flower and vegetable garden. She says that some of the straw goes straight from the coop onto her garden beds, while other parts of it go into her compost pile until spring.

The hens are meditative to watch, she said. "You watch them like you watch fish in a coy pond."

Her coop is a 9-foot-by-12-foot area with a small hen house in one corner. She never lets her hens out of the coop because they would likely roost up in the trees.

They have plenty of room in her simple coop made out of scrap wood with chicken wire stapled to it. She has had as many as seven chickens in the coop at one time.

Main said her coop is one of the funkier types of coops, whereas some of the people she has consulted with in the past have had "poultry palaces."

Hen houses do not need to be very big because the hens are only in there when they are laying or sleeping at night. Her hen house contains two nesting boxes. There is also a long, thick wooden branch running lengthwise, opposite the nesting boxes, which serves as their roost.

The straw covering the coop floor needs to be switched out only a few times a year to be kept clean and fresh, Main said.

More recently, the hen house was modified so that there is a hatch door to access the nesting boxes from the outside, making it more convenient for egg gathering.

Main expressed great enthusiasm for the joys of collecting eggs.

"You never tire of that," said Main grabbing an egg, still warm, from the nesting box, "just like you never tire of pulling a carrot or potato from the ground."

Main said she was once gathering eggs and was so eager that she reached under a hen sitting in the nest box. She said she found that the egg was being laid at that very moment. "It seemed to go from liquid to solid. It was sort of psychedelic," she said excitedly.

The hens are quiet except for the 10 minutes each day when they are laying. The hen who is laying the egg is actually quiet, but the other girls will make noise when they cheer her on, she said.

Two of her hens are Rhode Island

Reds, which make great pets, according to Main, who has had about a dozen different types of hens.

The other hen is a white Araucana that is missing patches of feathers because it is molting. Molting is an annual occurrence in which the hens gradually lose and re-grow all of their feathers.

The birds take a break from laying eggs when they are molting, and also during the winter for two to three months. The rest of the year, Main said, she gets 21 eggs per week.

In the past, Main has had more than three hens in order to feed her children. She likes to send a carton of eggs home with her daughter who lives in San Francisco.

"I used to have the eggs shipped to her when she was in Chicago going to medical school," she said.

Wandering through her various patches of tenderly loved plant life, she eagerly picked more green goodies to bring to her birds.

She grows certain plants, such as borage, collard greens, and purslane, specifically because her hens love to eat them. The greens make the yolk that dark orange color, she said.

Main's Woodside garden is an ideal setting for raising chickens in a garden, but Palo Alto is also home to some happy backyard hens.

Sandra Tucher currently has four chickens in the backyard of her home in Professorville. Tucher said her chickens are coexisting well with her kids and her other pets, including a dog.

One nice thing about the hens is that they come and greet you at the door, Tucher said.

Daily maintenance for her hens takes about 10 minutes every morning and 10 minutes every evening.

"I think people should realize that chickens are an investment; it's like having a dog. They have to be cared for," Tucher said. She keeps the chickens in her large backyard during the day and puts them in her coop at night.

"I know now that because of my chickens, I spend a lot more time in my backyard. I have an extra reason to go out and be in nature," she said

One down side is that they eat some of her plants, such as her ferns, she added.

Tucher said she did not worry about the recent salmonella scare because she knows where her eggs are coming from.

"It's fun to be a little closer to the land and food cycle and it's something that we eat every day," Tucher said

Positively Green

Let there be light ... and darkness

by Iris Harrell

have a confession to make. I love the long days of summer after I get over the difference when Daylight Savings kicks in. It takes a couple of weeks for my own internal clock to adjust and I find that even my sleeping is affected.

On a small personal side note, the one summer I spent in Alaska, I even found the ever-present natural daylight a challenge to my normal sleep patterns and had a difficult time getting to sleep each night.

I do feel a bit squeamish writing about the concept of light pollution, as those who are already feeling over-burdened with the constant message that we as humans are careening to our possible demise at lightning speed, will think I need to get a grip on more important things to contemplate.

So let's imagine for a "New York second" that we have extra time on our hands and want to contemplate our place in the universe. Would we be more apt to do that camping under the star-filled skies of Utah or walking the neon-lit streets of Las Vegas at 3 in the morning? At some point, we all have to figure out why we are here.

When I first heard the phrase "light pollution," I started to laugh. What will "they" think of next? But slowly, over time, I started to grasp the concept to grasp the concept.

Like many people, I am afraid of the dark, as we are not inherently nocturnal creatures. Humans are diurnal, meaning our eyes are adapted to live in sunlight. Since the invention of Edison's light bulb, man has engineered the elimination of night and darkness. Positive benefits and negative consequences have accompanied this change, just like the positive and negative effects that occur when we decide to engineer the damming of a river.

The positive effects of Daylight Savings time are obvious. There is less energy consumption in our daily effort to get to work and back home before nightfall. Less crime and fewer accidents occur in highly urbanized areas that are artificially well-lit at night. With better lighting design, we can light the streets without lighting the sky.

What are the negative consequences of this relatively new problem? Other species that are nocturnal, including high numbers of mammals, might be confused by the megalopolis of lighted city skies at night.

Think of light as a biological force, almost like a magnet. Migration time is becoming unclear for many species of mammals as they are drawn to the artificial light that now encompasses much of their world. Possible ramifications could be early breeding, which can be lethal. Leaving early to migrate to another geographical area could mean arriving too soon for safe nesting conditions to be right, thus leading to the threat of extinction of multiple species.

Nesting sea turtles look for dark beaches, which are diminishing due to increasing light pollution. The turtle hatchlings become confused by the artificial light that exists behind the beach where they are born. Should they go toward the white caps or the white lights?

Toads and frogs that live near lighted highways have developed unusual behavior. When should their night-time breeding chorus begin?

For those who are apathetic about the concept of extinction happening to multiple breeds and species, think of it as an early warning signal: What or who is next? Biodiversity is a massive topic we can cover at another time. But trust me. It matters.

Writer Verlyn Klinkenborg states in National Geographic (November 2008): "Humans need darkness. It is part of our biological welfare, our internal clockwork. The regularity of our cycles of waking and sleeping is a biological expression of the day and night of the light on Earth. Altering these rhythms is like altering gravity. There could be a biological toll to humans caused by light pollution."

The good news is that light pollution is easily solvable. By reducing the amount of artificial light in the sky, energy will be saved. Using street-light fixtures and exterior house lights that only illuminate what's beneath them will do the job without causing glaring night skies. If we think of darkness as a natural resource, we have a better perspective of how important it is in our lives. Currently two-thirds of the Earth's population live under skies polluted with light.

Klinkenborg's last statement in her article brings me back to that not inconsequential question of why are we here. "Light pollution causes us to lose sight of our true place in the universe ... and especially makes us forget the scale of our being, which is best measured against the dimensions of a deep night with the Milky Way arching overhead."

FORECLOSURES

Foreclosures are provided by California REsource, a real estate information company that obtains the information from the County Recorder's Office. The date is the recorded date of the deed when the lender took title to the property. The price is what the lender paid for it (usually the mortgage balance plus foreclosure fees). Each property is now owned by the lender and is for sale, or will be for sale soon, individually or through public auction. Individuals should contact a Realtor for further information.
